A 3-D View (article #3)

(View of Foster, Kinship and Adopted Children by James Kagan M.D. & Rick Delaney Ph.D.)

You may recall we have been describing the importance of understanding the whole child—your foster or adopted child. Use of the bio-psychosocial model provides us a three-dimensional look at the child and reduces the chances of leaving any stones un-turned. In the last article (#2) we looked at the biological dimension; now let's turn to the social dimension. This adds to our understanding of foster, kinship or adopted children; it allows us to examine four major social experiences, which they have possibly gone through. These are:

1. Difficulties in their earliest attachment relationships
2. Problems in their dysfunctional family-of-origin
3. The challenges of growing up in poverty and dangerous neighborhoods
4. Disruptive impact of multiple placements (and caregivers)

Individually, each of these social experiences can impact how a child develops. In combination with each other and laid on top of biological issues, the impact can be multiplied and very harmful. We will talk about each of these four social experiences in a bit, but let's return for a moment our case of "Johnny" from the last installment. You will recall that Johnny is a ten-year-old foster child, who has a "huge temper"; he threatens other people, and his anger explosions seem to come out of nowhere. We mentioned previously that genetic predisposition (for example, a tendency toward strong, volatile emotional reactions or general moodiness and irritability) might play a large role in Johnny's loss of control. His father's history of bi-polar and intermittent explosive disorder could factor in. But is that the whole picture here? Probably not. Johnny's genetic make-up, his "nature", would not inevitably express itself in "huge temper" outbursts and threats. However, the chances of anger problems may have been increased by "nurture", that is, by early social experiences that shaped him and "unlocked" certain genes, or impacted brain development. In this case Johnny's nature may have been impacted by negative life experiences (nurture), such as poverty or troubled mother-child relationships, or exposure to domestic violence, child abuse, etc.

Let's look at the four major social experiences, starting with the earliest attachment relationship.

Earliest Attachment Relationships

As foster or adoptive parents, your relationship to foster and adopted children can be impacted in part by the quality of their attachment. Attachment quality can be transmitted from one generation to another within families. This inter-generational transmission has a lot to do with the primary caregiver's own attachment quality or style. That suggests that the birth mothers' (or other primary caregivers') specific attachment styles can affect indirectly your relationships with your foster or adopted children. If you think of parent-child attachment as a dance, the child learns the steps from his or her first dance partner. When the child enters your home, the dance comes along with him or her. Let's look at these different caregiver attachment styles and how they can affect their relationships to their infants or young children.

1. Rejecting Mother Figures.

Rejecting mothers are uninvolved, neglectful, and insensitive. They often overlook or even invalidate their infants' needs. The infant can develop insecure attachment.

2. Preoccupied Mother figures.

Preoccupied mothers are oblivious to their infants' needs because they are consumed by the drama in their lives. The energy drain leaves little for their babies. The infant can also develop insecure attachment.

3. Frightened/Frightening Mother Figures.

F/F mother figures are consumed by their own unresolved trauma. This causes them to be frightened by the perceived intensity of their infants' demands and, in turn, to respond in frightening ways. The infant can develop disorganized attachment.

As you well know, many of your children started off relating to rejecting, preoccupied, or frightening mother figures. Experiences with these mothers or other caregivers can affect children's development (notably attachment) in profound and lasting ways.

Problems with Dysfunctional Family-of-Origin:

A full understanding of foster and adopted children with multiple negative impacts must include an assessment of prior families with whom they have lived. When children come from troubled families, those experiences impact them in ways that foster, kinship and adopted parents will almost certainly come to know. According to studies by the Center for Disease Control (see the ACE study for details) there is a strong correlation between family risk factors and later health and mental health problems. The effects of negative past experiences endured by your foster and adopted children can find their way into your family and continue to be played out within your home. By in large, foster and adopted children come from "multi-problem" families with these seven (7) common risk factors"

1. Recurrent physical, emotional, or contact sexual abuse
2. Emotional or physical neglect
3. An alcohol and/or drug abuser in the household
4. An incarcerated household member
5. Someone in the home who is chronically depressed, mentally ill, institutionalized, or suicidal
6. Domestic violence
7. One or both biological parents absent

The lion's share of foster and adopted children have endured some or all of these experiences and more. For instance, a child whose mother abuses drugs and suffers chronic depression may also witness domestic violence or endure sexual abuse by mother's boyfriend.

Growing up in Poverty and Dangerous Neighborhoods:

Any discussion of the child's social world would be incomplete without looking at larger issues. A large number of foster and adopted children come from disadvantaged and dangerous neighborhoods and live below the poverty line. The consequences of growing up in poverty can be dire. Poverty is linked to lower levels of child well-being. Specifically, poor children are more likely to achieve less in school, fail to graduate, and to have health, behavioral, and emotional problems. In addition, living in a dangerous neighborhood generally results in children experiencing:

1. Decreased parental supervision
2. Harsh, coercive parenting style with more reliance on physical punishment
3. Lower level of parent education
4. More frequent moves and changes to family structure
5. Adaptation to dangerous neighborhoods
6. Decreased level of parental responsiveness

Children from lower socio-economic backgrounds view things differently, often tending to misperceive neutral, harmless social situations as threatening. They often see danger where there is none, and they cynically assume the worst about other people and situations in which they find themselves.

Disruptive Impact of Multiple Placements (and Caregivers):

Once in out-of-home placement (in foster care), there is an additional risk that, with time, the child will be moved from one foster home to another. An unacceptably large percentage of foster children thus experience disruption and further instability in their lives. (These children may be no stranger to instability in that, before foster placement, they may have been moved around from one arm of the family to another and may have been raised by multiple mother figures, including near strangers.) Over time, a foster child can live an almost nomadic existence.

Placement in foster care followed by serial placements can have neurobiological consequences (anxieties increase measurable). Things go from bad to worse over time. The child's behavior problems produce placement changes which, in turn, produce more behavior problems. The unsettling amount of placements, caregivers, flux, separation and dislocation lead these children to become increasingly insecure. Occasionally they become indiscriminate in whom they approach for reassurance and attention. Or, oppositely, they withdraw and shun attempts by others to get close to them.

In summary, the negative impacts of troubled attachment relationships, dysfunctional family life, hostile neighborhoods and poverty, and multiple placements and caregivers can have deleterious effects on the developing foster and adopted child.

Family Development Camp

May 19 to 25, 2013

Little Beaver Camp

The Family Development Camp will cost $550 per person. Seven days and Six nights. Registration and deposit required.

The one week Family Development Camp is designed to help families to bond and help children with Attention Deficit Disorder (ADD), Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder (ADHD), Attachment Disorder (AD), Reactive Attachment Disorder (RAD), Oppositional Defiant Disorder (ODD), Obsessive Compulsive Disorder (OCD), Post Traumatic Stress Disorder trauma and adoption. With RAD so common and such a huge issue we have mainly focused on those children but many have multiple diagnosis. The focus of the camp is to increase love, laughter, bonding, self-control, and child conscience development in the family.

The goal of the camp is to teach parents of emotionally disturbed children how to help their child to be successful. Each morning the parents attend a training, encouragement support session. They then practice the new skills with staff support to fine-tune the interventions throughout the day.

The lessons are:

Taking care of yourself

Understanding the brain and how to heal it

Establishing respect

Understanding conscience development and how to advance it

Creating and maintaining the heart to heart connection

Helping a child develop self-control

Setting limits and helping the child to accept the limits

Supercharge your expectation of responsibility

Expect restitution for damages

Winning control battles

Teach your child to think for him/herself

Guide the processing of feelings

Building self-worth
